service work. The BRP manual is rather expensive. Here are others I'm sure. I print out pages as needed or bring the laptop out to the garage when working. I do most all my service work. Green Manuals and Midwest Manuals are the two most commonly used names. It's a PDF copy of the factory manual, but there's no guarantee that addendums issued after publication will be in it. It is a wonderfully made digital manual. Pages flip like a book. You can zoom in etc. Pretty much covers everything you need to know to be a successful DIY Spyder tech.

I print out pages as needed or bring the laptop out to the garage when working. This website is great, people are all so helpful. It's a money issue. Haynes and Clymers are reputable publishing houses. To produce a manual they would have to develop it from scratch, a time consuming and expensive proposition. From Rogers' experience with Spyder Codes BRP is not going to make available any information that can be incorporated into a manual, and Haynes and Clymers aren't going to break copyright laws by simply copying a BRP manual. They're too easy to find and go after if they did. So the economics don't pan out for them. On the other hand, there are unscrupulous individuals and companies who thumb their noses at copyright laws. You won't find a physical address for Tech Spark Studios, although according to a Whois search the website owner lives in MA, but that could be fictitious. The other outfit that produces the Green Manual, also known as Midwest Manuals aka Best Manuals aka who knows what all, is not traceable by ordinary means. Also, all corporate pages in the Can Am manual PDF, such as publisher info and title page, are missing. I suspect that the outfit that produces the Green Manual has an inside contact in the company that publishes the printed version for BRP who leaks a PDF copy of it to Green. It might even be a Chinese company. Since I've never looked at a printed BRP manual I don't know where they are printed. But if Green is in a foreign country that has no reciprocal copyright enforcement agreement with Canada BRP is up against it trying to shut them down, if they really wanted to. It might be that BRP is willing to look the other way since there is some market demand for Can Am manuals but most likely not great enough to justify tracking down and shutting down Tech Spark and Green. Since both outfits have been producing manuals for several years it's easy to believe they're either very deeply hidden in the Internet, or BRP takes a laissez faire approach to them.

Why BRP does not sell a PDF copy of their service manuals to owners is a mystery to me. In short, when you're competing with counterfeiters who get away with it, it's hard to make money.
